Best Reads from the Past Year

2007 has produced three wonderful Australasian story collections. Paddy O’Reilly’s The End of the World (UQP) is laconic, imaginative and moving. Susan Midalia’s The History of the Beanbag (UWAP) is deeply personal and honest. But the standout is NZ writer Charlotte Grimshaw’s Opportunity (Vintage), unusually gripping for a short story collection. The echoes between stories catch the reader in a net of chilling possibilities beneath the most ordinary seeming lives. The best novel may be Gail Jones’ Sorry, a profound and complex response to Australia’s dark past. JM Coetzee’s Diary of a Bad Year (Text) sits beguilingly on the cusp of fiction and non-fiction. In non-fiction, the Quarterly Essay continues with a timely analysis of the demise of John Howard, Exit Right (Black Inc) by Judith Brett. A glimpse of 18th century Lincolnshire is provided by Gratefull to Providen (Lincoln Record Society), the diaries of Matthew Flinders’ father. Two scorching personal memoirs, Tanya Levin’s People in Glass Houses (Black Inc) and Rebekkah Beddoes’ Dying for a Cure (Random House), expose the underside of Hillsong and Australia’s psychiatric services. And last, a practical guide to being green in the city: I admit a personal interest as the author is my sister-in-law, but Green is Good (HarperCollins) by environmental scientist Rebecca Blackburn explains the difference between the really constructive things we can do and the window-dressing trivia.
