The Hunchback in the Park Watching Dylan Thomas

With his heavy brown coat, a solitary thread caught on the edge of the bench, he drinks from a dark bottle pulled from an inside pocket and sits through the cold afternoon, watching me

(as if I wouldn't notice or mind).
How the pond takes the sky in, the wonder and shuffle of ordinary pigeons, even the way the keeper nods a discreet tolerance my way—our mister hasn't noticed.

With the elms, he plants himself down.
With the leaves, he sinks into the ground.
A solitary mister, he seems to mutter into the wind, hunched over his ragged notebook, alone in his watching, looking away when I catch his eye.

He has the eyes of a thinker and a drinker—and I'd know (though he doesn't know me).
I read the philosophies of the dead leaves, slow snails, young ducks, old water, and their insights I keep to myself. Many figures come here and go—the dark-suited and stiff men, wet dogs snuffling in their honesty, children with hand-me-down

Andy Jackson, ‘The Hunchback in the Park Watching Dylan Thomas’.
Transnational Literature Vol.11 no.1, November 2018. cruelties and language games, nurses on lunchbreaks with tender eyes—none of them without fault. I hesitate to say how mister appears, but I imagine his lines are straight on the left-hand side, crooked on the right.

When the day begins to fade and his bottle is as light as the glass of it, he straightens up, brushes some fragile, natural thing from his coat, and I watch him shrink back into the city. Towards a warm and safe place he must walk, followed by his own shadow.

Andy Jackson